Buildings that occupy the public realm, if dilapidated and unattractive, contribute to slum and blight, keep away patrons, discourage business, often are not code compliant, can be unsafe and do not fully contribute to the tax rolls. Improving the public realm is exactly what the CRA is intended to do and encouraging private enterprise to be a partner in the process is not only smart business, but it greatly increases the chances for long-term successful change. Positive changes made to properties in the public realm are an excellent investment because they benefit and strengthen the entire community—residents, businesses and visitors.
